BIOGRAPHY

Cash the Ticket is a half-horse humanoid who grew up in the countryside of Neverwinter along the coast. Growing up, Cash was one of the most athletic kids in the schoolyard. Their stamina, their strength, and especially their speed made them popular, and caught the eyes of bookmakers in the big city. Cash got scouted by their local sports circuit, and racked up the wins race after race. For a few years, life was glorious. Cash had everything before they were of maturity: fame, money, admirers. Crowds formed for every start, spectators coming from far and wide just to watch, and bet.

Gambling surrounded everything about the scene, something Cash learned long before they were able to fill out a ticket. At first, Cash only bet on other racers. Then, on themselves. Then, against themselves.

Eventually, Cash the Ticket found themselves involved in race-fixing schemes run by wide spread crime syndicates and corrupt bookmakers, connected by the mercantile trade guilds operating out of the harbor. They threw races, took side bets, feed insider information. All the while, they became more and more addicted to the thrill of the wager.

After one particularly viewed race, accusations of cheating exploded into a full blown controversy. Overnight, Cash went from a local celebrity to a ridiculed degenerate. The fame, contracts and sponsors vanished overnight. But the debts remained.

Cash the Ticket was forced to take on odd jobs at the docks, bouncing between merchant guilds and fishing crews. They worked as a deckhand and dockworker, loading cargo and doing repairs instead of working as a respected sailor. Their nights were spent sleeping under the docks and getting into bar fights at local taverns. Eventually, they were run out of town for stealing the betting pot of a tavern poker game and having their accrued bad reputation catch up to them. Now, they drift from town to town, pretending to be "between opportunities".
