BIOGRAPHY

TLDR: Sabre is a drow elf born in the Underdark, where Lolth ruled with chaos and cruelty, in the city Ched Nasad. His oldest brother taught him about Eilistraee (counterpart goddess to Lolth, inspiring with hope instead of despair) and helped him escape. Sabre wasn't good at deception, but did hone his dagger skills and stealth and used those to keep him alive. Sabre spent a lot of time getting used to the sunlight, observing the town of Secomber, and attempting to integrate into Secomber's community. Sabre eventually befriended the children first, and through them was able to integrate into human society, although outside strangers will always be cautious of a drow elf. He started to enjoy the uplifting music of taverns as a deep contrast to the music of the drow elves, and learned to move with the rhythm. Now, after watching the kids of the settlement grow into able-bodied teenagers, Sabre decided it was his turn to leave the settlement and take a journey of his own, looking for new experiences and new acquaintances, all while avoiding most other elves.

Sabre was born in the Underdark city of Ched Nasad as a son to a drow family of middling standing. As the youngest of 5 children in a household devoted to Lolth, Sabre was instructed in the ways of torture and deceit, although he was never as skilled as his brothers and sister. He was a curious child as opposed to an ambitious one, but was still smart enough to keep his head down and go along with the traditions of the Lolth drows.

His oldest brother, Amarok, was an enigma; Amarok was able to wield the ambition and ruthlessness of the strongest of drows, but understood that his path was not for everyone. Amarok taught Sabre about the goddess Eilistraee and the path of Drizzt, and with an extreme web of lies and some assistance simultaneously consolidated power while disguising Sabre's journey out of the Underdark.

On his journey to the surface through a plethora of underground tunnels, Sabre utilized the skills he learned from his family: his stealth, honed enough to appear like a wisp in the night; his dagger mastery, cutting through enemies that saw him through the smoke; and the ruthlessness of drow society, shouting inside of his mind that the world is "kill or be killed".

Once on the surface, Sabre needed to become accustomed to the light of the sun. He hunted and traveled under the darkness of the night, and hid away in deep caves during the day. After a year of activity at night and inching closer to every cave's entrance day by day until sunlight caused him only mild discomfort, Sabre decided to head for the nearest town of Secomber and took refuge in the shadows. Often unnoticed in the darkness, he observed the townspeople with curiosity built out of necessity and a bit of wonder. Occasionally, Sabre would leave the outskirts of town to hunt for food, but he would always return and observe how it differed from the world he left behind. His drow teachings would surface in his mind now and then, but Sabre knew that on the surface, communities were extremely different from the betrayal-ridden societies of the drow.

As passing days turned into tendays, and tendays into months, Sabre started his attempts of integrating into the town's society. It started with cautiously approaching small groups, whether they were extended families or wanderers, but the stigma surrounding drow elves was too strong to circumvent by simple caution. Any time Sabre felt that the opposite party was uncomfortable, he would leave as quickly as he came, leaving no possibility of a misunderstanding due to his species.

Sabre's breakthrough originated from observing the festivals from the sidelines. Festival days were a time of celebration, but Sabre was still disconnected from most facets of the community and was not particularly invested. His main focus was one of the methods of celebration: song and dance. As Sabre "attended" more and more festival days over multiple years, he got accustomed to the tunes and, one day, he began absentmindedly humming one of the mellower celebration songs.

The sun was glowing brightly, hovering over the horizon, and Sabre was humming the last day's tune, eyes closed, laid down on a knoll in a lush meadow. It was past the outskirts of town, but a group of families had decided to take a short journey to find herbs, flowers, and other plants to bring back to the settlement. About halfway through the song, Sabre felt some stems and leaves settle on his head and a few light giggles all around him. Without pausing his humming, Sabre slowly opened his eyes to a circle of children, some wearing flower crowns like the one on his head, the others holding enough flowers to make more. As he sat up, some of the children started to sing and dance along, while the few closest to him taught him how to weave flower crowns for others.

As the day deepened, the children's parents eventually found Sabre entertaining the children with small tricks like juggling rocks, singing the songs he's heard over the years, and picking them up or giving them piggyback rides. Although the parents rushed over to pull their children away, seeing the daggers strapped (but securely fastened) to his calves, the children enjoyed his company and told their parents about their new friend, who entertained them while their parents gathered plants.

After that day, the stigma around drow elves was overshadowed by the new factor of experiences. The humans' caution around Sabre diminished significantly, and in the settlement that he had learned to call others realized his expertise with daggers and hired him as a bodyguard. Sabre spent a lot of time with the children of the settlement and learned both Common and mischievousness from and with them, while the time that was spent with the adults taught Sabre how to be (somewhat) responsible, and the occasional manual labor or escort job gave Sabre a little bit of experience with working.

Most of the jobs that Sabre helped the townsfolk with rarely required his dagger skills, and the most an escort mission encountered was a single wild boar, which the townsfolk usually handled themselves. Sometimes while traveling and even in the town, Sabre would encounter elves who would be hostile until the rest of the party took lengths to explain his circumstances. Occasionally, the town would celebrate with drinks and music in the Seven-Stringed Harp, the town's only tavern, and Sabre would listen to the music with a clear mind and an open ear, tapping along to the beat as the townsfolk danced and cheered.

A few times around Secomber, Sabre met Liz, a tiefling guide. Whenever Sabre traveled with Liz, Liz would help him polish his Common and also teach him Common Sign Language when they had downtime.

As more time passed, Sabre became very comfortable with the townspeople, and the children grew into capable adolescents. As the former children started to help with most of the settlement's responsibilities, his time in the place he could now truly call home was coming to a close. Sabre was ready to take on a journey of his own on the surface of Faerûn, taking the experiences he amassed from the village and using them in the outside world.

Sabre's early journeys away from Secomber first took him west towards Waterdeep, where discrimination against drow elves remained strong, but the connections he made from escort missions around Secomber kept him afloat in the big city. The vastness of the city and the impersonality of most interactions made Sabre uncomfortable, so he kept making his way north until he reached the city of Neverwinter. Once there, he had less connections to rely on, but like at every stop along the way, Sabre would frequent the nearest tavern, enjoying the music and occasional gossip.

As he talked to Locke about his recent memory loss, Sabre started to remember more parts of his childhood. Originally born to the house of Zauana and before the pseudonym of Sabre, his mother named him Teblyn. Teblyn was never great at lying to others, but he made up for it in his ability to avoid interactions with stealth. His mother kept him in the shadows to do her bidding, mostly targeting minor political targets that had potential. At one point, Teblyn's mother had started referring to him as Sabre, and as years passed he had nearly forgotten the name Teblyn entirely.

In private, his brother Amarok had called him something entirely different: Soldiirn, which referenced his acrobatic skills and also meant something similar to "little brother". Amarok, as the embodiment of a perfect drow, was able to spend time with Sabre outside of supervision under the guise of supplementary education in torture and deceit, instead using that time to talk about Eilistraee, the good natured counterpart to Lolth. Amarok knew torture and deceit were parts of Sabre's weaknesses, and instead rigorously trained his strengths of acrobatics and stealth, occasionally taking breaks to talk of the world above. Sabre remembers those times fondly, and continues to hope that Amarok has fared well.

His first interactions with humans always required a name, and Sabre has always felt better than Teblyn, his original name, and Soldiirn, the name reserved for only his brother to use. As years passed in Secomber, the children would always ask Sabre if he had a last name, or if Sabre was his real name. (Lots of the heroic stories that were told involved sabre weapons, but never any person named Sabre, so the children were naturally curious.) The adults didn't have any problems referring to him as Sabre, but the children's questions stuck in his mind. One day, he took some time to choose his own name: Talaxle, which children had also been thinking of a name for Sabre, and one day a young child by the name of Mareen ran up to Sabre, said “I heard that drowsies are supposed to be all evil and mean, but you’re different. You’re odd. I’m going to call you Oddle.”, and ran off to tell her friends. Sabre, taken aback by this hit-and-run statement, thought about it more and decided to take Oddle as a secondary name, only mentioning Zauana to other drows at most for information on his family. A couple of weeks later, Mareen and her family moved away from Secomber, and Sabre continuously hopes that she and her family have been doing well for themselves.

Since the adults of Secomber never inquired deeper about Sabre’s background, Sabre kept the name Talaxle to himself. Part of his reasoning was because the town already knew him as Sabre, and another part of him still felt apprehensive about changing something that worked. The only one that asked about another name was Liz, who had to slowly chip away at the walls he had put up. Even after telling Liz about choosing Talaxle, Sabre asked Liz to keep referring to him as Sabre in public until he was ready to move forward.
