CHARACTER APPEARANCE

Finn's childhood was that of a lowborn street rat of Baldur's Gate. He stole scraps to live, though often stopped to watch any magical street performances he happened to pass by. Fortunately, he happened to let some sparks fly when he attempted to try and replicate one of those feats, sparks that a passing wizard had seen. He was then taken on as an initiate, leaving the street thief's life behind.

Some years later, Finn found himself looking outwards for adventure, even learning magic not quite enough to hold his attention for long anymore. Around this time, the wizard he was learning under made a small event of a trip to Candlekeep. While initially excited, and he did find the sheer amount of knowledge amazing, the steep cost and heavy gatekeeping of knowledge by the keepers of Candlekeep was disappointing. Unwilling to remain bound much longer to an otherwise very sedentary lifestyle, Finn decided it was time to head off, parting ways with the older wizard on amicable terms before venturing out with the first adventuring party willing to accept him. He's been a freelancer since, resulting in being hired into the current party - mostly because he can both fight and isn't above using magic (mostly Prestidigitation and Mage Hand) to speed up basic chores. He knows a few random druid spells because he managed to steal a book about them off of a merchant at one point, making use of the old skills he had learned early in life. Luckily, he avoided being seen, though there ...
